We three conspirators against the Count were like little children all that afternoon. We clung together, to my Aunts delight, who saw, in our taking to Mary Harbury, an earnest for the future. Up and down the house we went, along the galleries, into the chapel, then out on the terrace, wondering if we should succeed in frightening him. At last Arethusa said, Its all very well talking of frightening him, but its very like the old story of belling the cat. How shall we do it Why, said Mary, you know I am to be the White Lady; and so, when they are all in bed and asleep, I will slip out of my room into yours, and when we come out into the gallery, on our side of the house, Mr. Halfacre must meet us. Then we will all steal downstairs into the hall, and across it, and up the other staircase to their wing, and then Go on, said Arethusa. What then V Why, then, said Mary, we must all go into the Counts room, and frighten him. Ghosts dont go about like French policemen, said Arethusa, two by two. I never heard of a double ghost, or twin ghosts; still less of three ghosts together, --human nature wouldnt bear it. We cant all go in together. How then shall it be said Mary; for frighten him we will. This is what I think, said Arethusa. You...
