Not illustrated. 1880 Excerpt: .and Sandie and I stood looking at the unconscious lad. I wrung out pieces of wet rag in cold water, and Sandie laid them on his forehead, removing them the moment they felt heated. I doubt not it was that fellow Stevens who sent the puir boy aloft, for I heard him bullying some one, and I wish I had gone on deck to see what it was. He might as well have ordered a baby up the rigging as that know-naething child. He might ha thocht his head would spin round, and get giddy, and that he would come down to the deck quicker than he went up. I wonder he hadna fallen into the sea; it was just God s good providence that kept him from that end. Ah! Mr. Stevens, if I had the setting of you I d masthead you till the gale was blown over! and Sandie, with intense disrespect, shook his fist upward towards that part of the deck on which the second mate might be supposed to be standing just then. Poor little Willie! how pale he is! said I, looking down at him. Ay, that he does, and twill be lang ere the colour comes back to his cheeks again, I am afraid. Here, Andrew, you may bathe his brow now, for I m obleeged to help Eben in the galley this morning. The sea has been making a clean sweep amongst his pots and pans, and he...
